Chapter 1 by Christoph Laier

“Do you know about the naturalistic fallacy? It’s an attempt to drive a moral “ought” from an empirical “is”. Basically, if you use an argument that follows an “ought”-state like “We should forbid using cars” based on an “is”-state like “Cars are polluting out environment.” According to this theory by philosopher G.E. Moore this is wrong because you don’t have an ethical explanation why we should forbid using cars. This is very important in a discussion, because nearly everyone does it wrong. Do you know that-”

He stopped. His girlfriend didn’t even look up. She was browsing Facebook. He realised that she hadn’t listened to anything he just said.

He waited a couple of seconds.

“Did you say something, Honey?”

“No, nevermind”.

He continued doing nothing for two minutes. Then he silently started to cry and went upstairs.

The world always made him feel worthless, like a loser, although he knew he wasn’t an idiot. His friends were often mocking on him. Of course they didn’t always meant it to be mean, but it everytime they did it felt like someone was stabbing him in the back. Most of the time he could deal with it, but sometimes it haunted him until he got home, and when he finally arrived in his small flat, he closed the curtains.
